Law360 (November 28, 2022, 3:56 PM EST) -- A litigator who specializes in family law has moved from her solo practice to join Leech Tishman Fuscaldo & Lampl's offices in Western and Central Pennsylvania, the firm announced Monday.

MacKenzie F. Grills has been welcomed as counsel in Leech Tishman's litigation and alternative dispute resolution and its family law practice groups. Grills will split her time between the firm's Pittsburgh and State College, Pennsylvania, offices, according to a release.

Grills did not respond to a request for comment.

"It is a pleasure to welcome MacKenzie to the firm," Pete A. Fuscaldo, Leech Tishman's managing partner, said in a statement. "She brings to the firm a well-established family law practice as well as a reputation for effectively resolving civil disputes and criminal matters on behalf of clients. She will be a great asset to our Pittsburgh and State College litigation and family law teams."

Grills joined the firm after running her own practice in the Pittsburgh area for about five years, where she focused on family law, criminal defense and personal injury defense matters. She will continue to grow her practice in those areas at Leech Tishman.

Her family law practice advises clients on issues of custody, divorce, support and equitable distribution, and protection from abuse. Grills handles business and property valuation matters and drafts premarital and post-marital agreements for clients.

Grills earned her law degree from Duquesne University School of Law and started her legal career with her own practice. In October 2013, she joined DeRiso DeRiso & Suher in Pittsburgh, then went back to running a solo firm in December 2017.
